Course Description

6950I. ST Immigration, Policing, Enfo. Addresses specific topics relating to the crime problem and the criminal justice process. 3 s.h.

Few topics in contemporary society have more significance and public policy salience than the study of immigration, crime, and border enforcement.

This course is divided into three sections to give students a better understanding of immigration in the United States and of the methods used to enforce immigration law. In the first section, students will become familiar with immigration theory and typologies as well as the history of U.S. immigration policy. The second section of this course considers the perspectives on the debate on immigration and crime, while the third section uses the criminal justice system to explain the policing and enforcement of immigration law. Global immigration cases are also considered. To facilitate student learning, this course culminates in a town hall forum where students are encouraged to debate the merits of immigration and crime from various stakeholder perspectives.
