Course Description

4847. Writing and the Public Sphere: Community Literacies and Organizational Storytelling. This course addresses storytelling in public contexts, focusing on such areas as writing for social change, community literacy projects, digital and social media rhetorics, social and political campaigns, and organizational storytelling by for-profit businesses, not-for-profit organizations, and other entities. Students will gain practice in modes of public and civic discourse as well as organizational communication. As writers, students will learn to analyze specific writing situations and strategically employ writing strategies, genres, and story-based approaches to communications. Prereq.: C or better in ENGL 1551 or ENGL 1551H. 3 s.h.

Writing is something that can be improved through practice. Every writer, regardless of their prior writing experiences, can succeed in this course if they apply effort, use resources effectively, reflect on their writing strategies, and make changes as needed. My hope is that all students will develop the knowledge they need to do well and that all students—even those who perform well early in the semester—will develop greater knowledge and skills through practice. The goal is to prepare you for writing and communicative tasks in the university, in the workplace, and in your civic, social, and professional life.
